

DAY -19, DAILY REPORT, 02 -12 -2021 (THURSDAY)

Today, I had a new experience. When I woke up in the morning, I got a positive vibe, and i got ready and the cab came, and I went to the office. In my first session was to add the pdf file to github. First we want to git init to initialize the git and secondly we are using the cd file name and touch file name. After that I added the command called git add . The command tracks all the changed files in the working tree and stages it - now these files are ready to be committed. After that we are giving git commit -m “report” for example it will commit some relevant message - this command sends your changed files working tree to local repo. Fourth step is the git push origin branch name from the repository in the github it will send files from local repo to remote repo in github.com. And it will go to the git clone command. We can check whether there are files existing in the current repository. I am continuing the extreme ownership introduction part of the story of ramadi, iraq: the combat leader’s dilemma. Only the low rumble of diesel engines could be heard as the convoy of humvees eased to a stop along the canal road. Iraqi farm fields and groves of date palms spread for some distance into darkness in all directions. The night was quiet. Only the occasional barking of a distant dog and a lonely flickering light gave any indication of the Iraqi village beyond. No lights were visible from the convoy and darkness blanketed the road, blacking out most of the surroundings to the naked eye. Some were powerful enough to wipe out an entire vehicle and all its occupants in a sudden inferno of flying jagged metal and searing heat. They have appeared clear and the assault force of seals and iraqi soldiers stealthily pushed across the bridge on foot toward a group of buildings where the terrorist reportedly took refuge. Now was a critical opportunity to capture or kill him before his next attack. The seal assault force patrolled up a narrow street between the high walls of residential compounds and moved to the door of the target building. The humvees pushed forward across the bridge, down the narrow street wide enough only for a single vehicle, and came to stop in security positions around the target building. Each vehicle's turret contained a seal manning a heavy machine gun, ready to provide fire support if things went sideways. I was the ground force commander, the senior seal in charge of this operation. I had just stepped out of the command vehicle and onto the street near the target building, when suddenly someone yelled we got a squirter. It was our Eod operator nearby who had seen the squirter. Perhaps it was the terrorist himself or someone with information on his whereabouts. We couldn't allow him to escape. The EOD operator and I were the only ones in position to pursue him, so we sprinted after the man. We chased him down a narrow alleyway, around a group of buildings, and down another dark alleyway that paralleled the street where our humvees were parked. Those hands didn't possess a weapon, but he might have a grenade in his pocket or, worse, be wearing an explosive suicide belt under his clothing. Anyone associated with such a high- level terrorist might have such deadly devices, and we couldn't assume otherwise, he had to be searched quickly in the next daily report i will continue the story, that's all for today.

Thank you.
