

DAY -15, DAILY REPORT, 26 -11 -2021 (FRIDAY)

Today, I got a new experience. When I woke up today, it gave me one more day in my life, and I got ready for the office to continue my internship work. Then I read a book called extreme ownership. In the foreword it has said that many exceptional readers served alongside throughout our military careers. The consistent attribute that made them great was that they took absolute ownership. Extreme ownership not just of those things for which they were responsible. But they made no excuses. Instead they impacted their mission .These leaders cast no blame. They leveraged assets, relationships and resources to get the job done. Their own egos took a back seat to the mission and their troops. These leaders truly led. In the years since we left active duty, we have worked with multitudes of business professionals. From senior executives to frontline managers across a vast range of industries, including finance, construction etc. The most high performance teams we've worked with demonstrate this mind set in their organizations. Since the publication we've heard the leaders across the United states and around the world whose lines have been strongly impacted for good. They've told us how implementing its principles changed their lives and made them better a more productive employee,a more supportive spouse, or a engaged parent. Once people stop making excuses , stop blaming others, and take ownership of everything in their lives, they are better leaders, better flowers, more dependable and actively contributing team members, and more skilled in aggressively driving towards accomplishment and they are applying these leadership principles have helped readers accomplish, what others or even they themselves, had previously thought impossible. Extreme ownership has helped people all over the world. Every day we heard new stories- different people, different businesses, different industries. The details change. The characters are diverse. There are always slight differences but their outcomes are ultimately the same. “I can’t believe now that it works” is a common response. Since the release of extreme ownership, the fundamental principles of combat leadership that we learned on the battlefield of Iraq have been exposed to, understood, and implemented by hundreds of thousands of readers around the world. We’ve worked with thousands more individuals through our leadership consulting business. We get reports from military leaders on the front lines putting the principles to work against our nation’s enemies; these leaders are “leading up the chain of command” to receive the green light for approval to launch on critical battlefield missions or utilize crucial resources. Chief executive officers of massive, global companies detail how they have initiated extreme ownership in their organization and observed their personnel throughout the chain of command step up and lead. We hear from first responders who utilize the lessons from extreme ownership in official training programs to lead their troops in stressful and dangerous situations. Leadership is the most important thing on the battlefield and the principles of good leadership do not change regardless of the mission, the environment. And after that i have done how to create a 100 square using html and css tags. That's all for today, thank you.
